I stop us in the lighted doorway of a Laundromat. The smell of detergent surrounds us. "You know why they're staring, right?"

"It's either because I'm not black or because you're not Korean." His face is shadowed, but I can hear the smile in his voice.

"I'm serious," I say, frustrated. "Doesn't it bother you?" I'm not sure why I'm pursuing this. Maybe I want proof that if we had the chance to continue, we would survive the weight of the stares.

He takes both my hands, so now we're standing face to face.

"Maybe it does bother me," he says, "but only peripherally. It's like a buzzing fly, you know? Annoying, but not actually life-threatening."

"But why do you think they're doing it?" I want an answer.

He pulls me in for a hug. "I can see that this is important to you, and I really want to give you a good reason. But the truth is, I don't care why. Maybe I'm naïve, but I do not give a single shit about anyone's opinion of us. I do not care if we're a novelty to them. I do not care about the politics of it. I don't care up arents approve, and I really,
